Going bald is something every man dreads, but unfortunately it's something that can't be controlled. Some guys are unlucky enough to start losing their hair in their teenage years.

Although most men would be able to try anything to stop the onset of baldness, there really isn't anything for them to try at the minute. The way that science develops however, there may well be in the future.

There are some treatments on the market which pledge to fight continuing hair loss. Depending on how far your baldness extends and how much you can afford to spend on treatment every much determines which ones would be worth trying.

Although it has now been around a while, Rogaine is still the most popular remedies that you can readily purchase. The active ingredient in this is Minoxidil.

There are always studies being run somewhere into the effectiveness of baldness cures, and Rogaine does well in these. As well as slowing the balding process, some testify that it has actually stopped it in its tracks.

If you have tried Rogaine and haven't achieved the results you were hoping for, then a trip to your Physician may be in order. Here you can get Propecia on prescription, which is a much stronger remedy. It has been approved by the FDA and as well as slowing the process of balding, it also encourages hair to grow back.

Most drugs carry side effects, and Propecia is no exception. A low dosage is recommended to start with, which can then be increased if you have no unpleasant reactions.

The last treatment I'm going to tell you about today is the laser comb, which has had positive results in many trials. You simply apply the comb to your scalp daily, and the process may be slowed or even stopped.

There are many other treatments that men are trying in their never ending quest to beat baldness, have a look online for these. All we can really do is trial and error to see which suits us best, and hope that scientists can make that breakthrough and cure baldness for good.

Besides baldness, this author also regularly blogs regarding ladders for sale and aluminum stepladders.
