Wooden Shed Kit - Choosing The Right One

There are a few important considerations you should be aware of if you are about to part with your hard earned money on a wooden shed kit. You must first determine what kind of kit would best suit your needs. It shouldn't cost an arm and a leg to get the extra storage space you need from a wooden shed.

Appropriate Size

Assessing your storage needs is a great starting point. If you are looking to make room in the garage so your car can fit, then a small wooden shed won't work well for you if you just fill it so full that you can barely open the door. You should buy a wooden shed kit with extra room to grow. Another consideration is how much of a footprint your shed will take up on your property. You don't want a large shed to fill up a small area.

Location of Your Shed

A wooden shed that will only be used for storage will be better placed in a location that isn't visible from windows or the back porch or deck. The reason is that storage sheds tend to not be as attractive as other kinds of sheds such as, playhouses, pool cabanas or garden sheds. They don't usually come with any fancy trim or windows that are easy to break into.

But, let's say your wooden shed will be used for another reason like a small guest house or retreat, then it's definitely best to put an attractive shed in a spot that you'll want to show it off to visitors. You'll want to put it in plain view.

Floor

Another consideration will be what type of base your shed will sit on. Typically, this would be a wooden frame that you can purchase separately from the main shed kit or build yourself from scratch. The advantages of a wooden frame base are the ease of building, cost and flexibility. Wooden bases can be used as a skid to make relocation of your shed possible without having to tear it down.

The other alternative is to pour a concrete slab for the base of your wooden shed. This is a great option if you know the location of your shed is permanent.

If you have a few basic construction skills, about one weekend of time and the desire to have an attractive wooden shed in your own backyard, then a wooden shed kit is the perfect solution for you.
