Reasons Why Wooden Sash Windows Will Last Longer Than Modern Plastic Sash Windows Are Few

The reasons why wooden sash windows will last longer than modern plastic sash windows can be seen in houses that are over one hundred years old. Some, if not all, of the original windows are still standing on the homes.

In climates where the elements are harsh, the wooden windows will, no doubt, suffer. But they can be restored, refurbished and replaced to last more than a hundred years again.

The way homes were built a hundred and fifty years ago proves that the structure was sound, and the windows are still more or less intact. They did not have sealants, but somehow these windows stood up to the snow and rains.

The plastic windows are very strong, as well. And they will endure the harsh elements of almost any climate. In fact, they will probably do better in rain and snowfall than scorching hot sunny days. They look clean and neat, and you can buy them in any color that you will never paint. However, the paint will eventually peel and chip, and the windows will become brittle over the years. The plastic can only handle so much abuse, and then, rather than try to sand and paint them, it would be more cost-effective and less time consuming to simply buy new ones.

You can find durable, beautiful plastic sash windows that are modern, open several different ways, and will create an attractive window style to your home. You may even be able to purchase them with a ten-year guarantee. But that may be the extent of it. The fact that they can only be guaranteed for a decade, or even three, if anyone will guarantee them for that long, is the obvious extent of their life.

Restoration companies will gladly restore your old, broken down wooden windows, so that your Victorian or older home looks like it when it was just built. They can replace the windows in part or in full, replicating exactly what they looked like before.

So, while thinking about purchasing new windows for your home, just do a little research and find out why wooden sash windows will last longer than the modern plastic sash windows.
