Review Of Episode 1 Of Hbo's True Blood

HBO's vampire series "True Blood " started yesterday evening with it's premier episode "unusual Love". The episode is the series pilot where a waitress as a local New Orleans bar meets a vampire named Bill, and from there a complex relationship starts. So what did I like to think of the first episode of the show?

Do I believe it has legs? All those questions will be answered soon enough within this review. But for now, let me tell you what I did and did not like about it, starting off with the "likes " first. I did like the gothic look to it, which is completely predicted and standard considering it's filmed in Louisiana, the deep south.

If you are familiar with 2005's releases "The Skeleton Key " with Kate Hudson, and "Venom " with Agnes Bruckner, then you already know the landscape of the series visually. Another like of mine was Anna Paquin's character Sookie...well...at least halfly.

Paquin plays the task of a southern barmaid very well, and her look is right for the role and the show overall. I also appreciated the attempt at adding some variety to the show with two black main characters, one of the standouts being Sookie's best friend Tara Thorton, played by Rutina Wesley.

Although in most shows or series filmed in New Orleans, the casting directors are quick to represent the right racial makeup of the city, unlike "Seinfeld " which managed to get thru an entire eight seasons without representing the extreme variety of midtown New York.

The character was initially supposed to be played by Brooke Kerr (Whitney from Passions), but I felt Wesley was more authentic in look and perspective. I also liked the opening scene of the first episode, which had a young couple going into a corner store and getting into an oral confrontation with the store clerk posing as a vampire, and a real vampire / redneck.
