The number of teenagers that own mobile phones is growing daily. Here in the United States the number is currently about 50% of all children under 18 owning a mobile phone.

This number incidentally just keeps on rising, and its little wonder that we never spend enough time with our kids. They are always otherwise engaged.

We never really know who it is that they are sending texts, or photo messaging, or even talking to on their mobile phones.

This is not to say that all children who own a mobile phone are irresponsible, far from it! The majority of children with mobile phones are responsible enough to know what is the right or wrong thing to do with their mobile phones.

But it is always a prudent thing to let your children know the correct way to use their mobile phones once they have purchased one.

If your child's mobile phone is connected to your household phone bill, you must make them aware of exactly how much their constant use of their mobile phones is costing; many times parents have had a shock to their systems when they receive their phone bill.

Make sure there are ground rules as to when the children can use their phones, and what are appropriate pictures or texts to send on their mobile phones.

If your child is a teenager, make doubly sure that they know not to use the mobile phone when they are driving. Whether they are using it to text or answering the phone makes no difference, the statistics show that over 6000 kids die every year in car accidents and nearly 50% of those accidents are mobile phone related.

As long as kids know what dangers are out there, we can try to keep them safe.
