An Online Degree Is A New Beginning!

American likes to consider itself the land of second chances; this includes getting a higher education. Re-inventing yourself may not be uniquely American, but here is where you can see some of the greatest success stories. Many people are finding those new changes in on line degree programs that allow them to deal with real life responsibilities while they learn.

You're certainly not alone if you have dropped out of college. There are a number of universities that boast that the odds of incoming freshmen get their Bachelors degree from them is tough. Such august institutions of higher learning as Harvard, MIT and Yale have dropout rates as high as 75%. The New York Times reported that, as an average, of all those who start as freshmen only 50% get their degree. Primary reasons are inadequate high school preparation, finances, health, personal disaster or immaturity in dealing with degree program responsibilities.

At the same time, the salary differential between a high school grad and someone with a Bachelors degree is getting wider and wider. The U.S. Census reports the average salary of a high school grad is $30,000. An individual who completes a four-year program averages nearly 75% more, at $52,000. The person with the Bachelors also enjoys better benefits packages, including life and health insurance and retirement programs, among other things. If you need more information about online distance learning, look on the internet.

What might be the best way to get that second chance is through a change of venue. Many drop-outs come from brick-and-mortar campuses and then had to drop out because of a number of reasons. Among those are financial considerations, family circumstances, illness or just plain bad luck. Switching to an online school can solve a lot of these issues for the following reasons:

(1) If you dropped out to get a job or have a child, you can make your online education conform to your job and life. You can study from home, meaning you have one less place to commute to. In these days when it seems the world itself is pressed for time, this is something that's an advantage and saves money too.

(2) Maybe you found out what you originally majored in wasn't for you. Going online allows you to sample various courses before making the ultimate decision of a career path. You can sample the waters first, find out what you're truly good at, and then dive in. Long range, wouldn't it a good idea to enjoy your line of work? Here's that chance. There is an abundance of information about distance learning degree on the web.

(3) The campus is wherever you are. All you need is a laptop and some kind of high speed modem. From there you can take your class whether you're on the road in a hotel room, sipping a latte at your favorite coffee klatch or at a laundromat. Many high school grads end up in sales jobs, so this is a particular advantage for them.

In fact, many come back more mature and knowing what's truly expected of them. Online schools are giving them the second chance to better themselves. No matter where you left off in the past, take the chance to get a distance learning online degree you need to give yourself your new start.
