In ancient Greece and Rome, the bride and groom donned a garland about their own necks, symbolizing new life, anticipation and also fertility. Conventional Celtic wedding bouquets incorporated ivy, thistle along with heather. The garland was not made of flowers but of powerful spices and herbs. The odors have been assumed to have magical powers and meant to keep away evil spirits. The garland was deemed to be a symbol of love and joy. In effect, bridal bouquets and wreaths were initially made of herbs and bulbs of garlic. According to popular belief, herbs and garlic had magical properties to defend against any evil spirits which may trouble the couple's foreseeable future. In addition, various herbs carried different symbolism.

For instance, dill often is the spice of lust. It had been believed that whenever a bride-to-be toted that with garlic, straight down the aisle, the lady would lust only for her groom. Another custom which was adopted when herbs were still used in wedding ceremonies had been the preparation of a kissing knot with rosemary and roses tied together.

At the time Queen Victoria wedded Prince Albert, the spices and herbs were replaced by fresh blooms, primarily marigolds. Edible blossoms were also in the flowers. The bride would carry her flowers as she went straight down the aisle. The particular dill from the bride's flowers was eaten by the bride, the bridegroom, along with their wedding guests during the wedding reception, as the herb was meant to boost sexual desire.

In England, the bride together with her bridesmaids walk to the church with each other. Usually, a little child leads all of them to the chapel while scattering flower blossoms across the way.
