Men and women who join our all-volunteer armed forces work long hours and spends weeks, months and even years away from their loved ones to protect our nation. Not since the days of WWII have we depended on them for the security not only of our nation, but the world. These military members unquestionably deserve the benefits that are now available to them through the New GI Bill, which offers financial aid to help military members and veterans pay for school.

The GI Bill was first enacted under President Franklin D. Roosevelt in 1944 to help soldiers returning from WW II go to college so they could re-enter the work force after serving in the military during the war. More than two million veterans used the financial aid available to them to go back to school. Having the largest educated work force in the history of the nation led to an unparalleled period of economic prosperity in America. Today, the men and women in the service are working long and difficult hours to combat the terrorism that has proliferated all over the world since 9/11. That's why the New GI Bill was enacted in July of 2009. The new bill, called the Post-9/11 GI Bill, was put together to help active duty members who served 90 days or more after September 11, 2001. The purpose of the bill is to provide service members and their families access to educational benefits through grants and scholarships provided by the Department of Veterans Affairs.

One of the best things about the New GI Bill is that it covers tuition and fees for online education. Not every service member wants to attain a traditional degree. They may want to use their financial aid to complete an independent study program or to complete their Continuing Education credits for a job they already have. All of these types of online education are covered in the New GI Bill under a program called the Montgomery Bill.

An online degree may be the type of education that most suits military members because of the flexibility it offers. When veterans or military members decide to use the financial aid available through the GI Bill for an online program, they need to make sure their university or college is properly accredited. The Department of Veterans Affairs will not allow money from the GI Bill to be used to pay for classes at an unaccredited university or college. There is an abundance of information about online grant on the web.

Another important facet of the New GI Bill is the ability for some eligible service members to transfer their benefits to their spouses or children. In addition to transferring benefits, there are also some scholarship and grant programs available for family members. The Marine Gunnery Sergeant John David Fry Scholarship is available for children who have a parent who is killed while on active duty. Scholarships and educational benefits for family members may be applied to online education, if they so choose.

Applying for the New GI Bill can be done online, or in person at the local Veterans Affairs office. Military members have up to $49,000 in financial aid that they can use to further their education. The GI Bill can be used to defray the cost of supplies, books, or other fees. There are some situations in which the GI Bill will cover 100% of tuition costs.

With the advent of online education, going to school for military members and vets has never been easier. The financial aid that is available to our military through the GI Bill allows these men and women the opportunity to complete their education to the highest level they wish.
