

Published based on Value Added Education At An Online University

Value Added Education At An Online University

For better or for worse, the possession of a college degree has taken on immense importance in the job markets of today. Yet these can be seen as a detriment to some, such as eager entrepreneurs, and as a financial burden to far too many. College is expensive and time consuming at its best. So what about online university? Is this a sound option?

This question is up for debate. Many in the tried and true real world physical schools with the ivy walls will say no, it is a lesser degree. But realize that their jobs may soon be at risk when the student body flees for the freedom of cyberspace. High quality instructors are getting online and doing very well at teaching those students who populate the internet halls of learning, so the tide is shifting a bit.

In time the status of a distance degree should catch up to those of brick and mortar gigs, but in the world of commerce they already are. Most hiring firms, and human resources departments, are not as concerned about where you went to school as they are with how well you did while attending. Some do not even truly consider what your major was.

In particular, some degrees are actually better suited to earn in an online environment. Anything having to do with electronic communications for instance, or distance learning, or even media at large will work very well through this medium. As has been said before, times they are a-changing. Business is at the forefront of these changes, and academia is never far behind.

Over time it is fairly certain that going to school from a distance, and using the internet to do so, will become much more commonplace. The degrees earned thereby will have the same prestige as those from more established halls of learning. What is more important, where you go to school, or what you are learning thereby?

The true value in an online degree is in the fact that it takes much more discipline to achieve it in such a way, as you are largely on your own, and it takes a more advanced way of seeing things. Your degree earned in such a way points to you as a cutting edge personality, and that has a certain value all its own.

The bottom line, which must always be considered, is that a degree from an online university has a value unique to itself. It takes a distinct personality type to complete such a task, and the edgier markets of today need such individuals. If you are destined for the modern edge of business today, consider taking advantage of this available opportunity.

Thank you for reading our Helpnets article on online university in your search for help with online university online. Visit Helpnets.com today for all your online help needs.

You can also find this article published on Value Added Education At An Online University, and on the tag pages blog, college, computer, E-Learning, education, internet, news, online university, school, shopping, university, web.