Since schools online focus primarily on a written format with discussion boards and chat rooms and written tests, being able to communicate effectively with the written word is very important. Most, if not all, of your online college classes will require papers in addition to the other work that is accomplished online. By focusing on the basics, like grammar, punctuation, syntax rules, and composition and organizational structure, you can be light years ahead of others by getting those skills down pat before you move on to other more difficult classes in your online degree program.

Your online degree program will also help you to develop in other more esoteric ways. Not only is it a great written work, but it is performed as a play and an opera. You may develop a wider appreciation of the arts by taking English composition.

One more advantage to taking English composition as one of your first classes is the organizational skills you will learn. You will be taught how to compose an essay or paper in a structured manner that must follow a pre-ordained format. Being able to put together papers and assignments that are clear and easy to read will be a skill you will use in almost every online degree class you take. The ability to follow an organizational pattern like this may also help you with other tasks, like having a good study ethic.
