My online dating career has been an on and off one, depending upon where I'm at with my relationships. However, I've always found it to be a trusty source of dates that I return to whenever I've needed to. I've found more success over the years, thanks to some strategies that I never kept in mind to begin with.

Too many people simply just throw up a profile that sounds as generic as possible, hoping people will like their picture, or simply play the numbers game and contact them. I have news for you though.

Make your profile interesting and funny, or anyone looking at your profile will likely pass you by. If you include some witty humor and a call to action, you'll be amazed at the difference that a few small tweaks will make.

Stay away from the cliché phrases that you see in so many profiles that you read, and do something different. If yours looks like the rest, someone may read about you for a few seconds before moving on, as they'll see you as a dime a dozen when it comes down to it.

When it comes to pictures, show as many of them as you can. More is better, but don't be overwhelming either. Limit it to somewhere between five and eight, and make the pictures cover a range of activities.

Doing this will show that you're active and adventurous, and your prospective dates will begin to picture themselves in these interesting situations with you. As long as you look like you're having fun, you'll win major points as far as getting their attention goes.

Striking a chord with your readers is equally critical. If you were writing an article for a newspaper or a magazine, you'd want to do the same thing. Why should this be any different? Relate to your readers and it'll pay off.

These are all simple tips, but they're pieces of advice that way too many people overlook. The good news is that they can all be fixed within a matter of minutes.
