An Article About The Severity Of Plagiarism And The Ways On How You Can Capably Avoid It

Basically, plagiarism means replicating someone else's work without giving them due credit. It is a grave offence that can even lead to eviction in many academic institutions.

Plagiarism can either be intentional whereby you consciously plan to go out and copy someone's work or accidental whereby you utilize somebody's work without realizing it, but whatever the case might be, plagiarism can end your academic career.

Below are some ways to keep away from plagiarism:

Stating your sources might sound very basic. You can blame it either on unawareness or slothfulness but you will be surprised at the number of students who simply do not refer to their sources.

Often, students are just so relieved to finally complete a paper that they fail to remember to refer to the sources as they are winding up. Furthermore, a student might not be cognizant that he has to mention the source when he makes use of somebody's work.

It is important for you to take time to carefully go through your paper after you write it down as it is very easy for references from other works to move stealthily into the paper without your notice.

Since there is no differentiating the planned from accidental plagiarism you need to delete any words as soon as you notice them. Even the sentences from the paper that you believe were copied from someplace else either by accident or intentionally.

You should not feel lured to replace even a single letter from the original work if you are contemplating paraphrasing somebody else's work. You are required to use their exact words in the paper and it would be great if you would always wrap it up in quotes as you mention your sources either at the end or in-line.

It is easy to avoid plagiarism when you are not only familiar with the rules to follow but also revise your paper thoroughly as the consequence for not doing so could be terrible. Always scrutinize your paper carefully before handing it in.
