Sash Wood Windows Or Plastic Windows Which Gives A Better Impression In An Office Environment

Have you ever asked yourself, wooden sash windows or plastic windows which option gives a better impression in an office environment. It very much depends what business is being run and what message the managers want to give their customers, as to which windows look better - wooden sash or plastic.

A wooden sash window is one of those that are made of more than one piece, like the ones in old Victorian houses. Think of a stately home renovated into a plush office building, and you would immediately think of sash windows. They are often designed to look like lots of little square windows, and slide up and down easily. Also, this gives the office a great cheap air conditioning facility in the summer!

Think now of a purpose-built office block, like those you find on industrial estates, or in city centres. These are the ones that are often made to non-Fibonacci standards, and have strange or unique shapes. Plastic windows might suit better here, crisp, white and shiny. This would fit well into the decor of a modern and fashionable office, usually decorated white to connote cleanliness and space.

Not forgetting, that plastic windows often open from one side or another, or the top or bottom, meaning that if the wind is blowing in the right direction, the office workers will get a good breeze. But if the wind is blowing in the opposite direction, the workers might need to bring a hand held fan or some ice cubes into work! Or beg the boss for an air conditioner.

But then there are the in-between buildings. Neither old and rustic, nor brand spanking new and modernistic. What sort of ventilation system should these have? Well there depends on the nature of the business.

Think about a company, for example, that decorates gardens. They want to look homely and inviting. They are trying to say to their customers 'we will make your garden look pretty and coax in wildlife'. Sash windows may work best here, especially the wooden kind.

How about a modern construction and interior decorating company, that just so happen to have come into an old manor house in the sticks? Well, they want to let their clients know they are modern, up to date, and fashionable. So they would probably put plastic windows in, bright white and scrubbed daily by their cleaners no doubt!

In conclusion, wooden sash windows or plastic windows which option gives a better impression in an office environment? What the business needs to know is, who are they targeting, and what would 'fit' best in the building they have purchased to run their company from?
