Are Online Degrees Requirements For Success?

You've worked hard in your current position, but you feel like you're stuck. You talk to the newer hires and realize that you don't necessarily understand what they're talking about. You've been considering getting that MBA, but you know you can leave your position. Consider an online degree, and go over the following points carefully.

PRO: An Online Degree is not Limited by Geography

You've just gotten the hang of the internet, and you like how it's made speaking with your foreign partners just so much easier. Now think of that in terms of going to school. You don't have to leave your job to go to that specialist school in Asia or Europe, just inquire if they have an open university or an online component. Don't be surprised to find that tuition fees are considerably lower because you aren't paying for overhead expenses than studying on-campus would entail.

CON: Getting a Online Degree from Anywhere Doesn't Necessarily Bode Well

The most dangerous thing about the internet is its propensity towards anonymity. So if you're not careful, you can get fooled into paying for a sub par education from a questionable organization. One good rule of thumb is consider checking out the schools or universities you already know about to see if they have online programs. Also consider doing research and even making calls to the organizations. Be sure to check if they are accredited by reputable institutions if you'd like your employer to recognize your degree.

PRO: You can Study for an Online Degree at Your Own Pace

Because the online or open universities are aware that the majority of their students are working, the classes are structured in a flexible manner. This means you can do your readings and requirements at your own pace, which is a bonus for the busy student. Of course this means it also requires self-discipline.

CON: An Online Degree has no classroom

As classrooms have been eliminated in the online university, you may miss out valuable networking and collaborative work that you can expect from a regular university setting. So make the effort to make a connection with your teachers and fellow students, albeit virtually through the forums, message boards or other social networks. You never know how knowing the right person may aid you. Though if you're expecting it to be a party, you're probably going to be sorely disappointed.

Getting an online degree requires a real commitment on your part, but there are some key advantages and rewards that are definitely worth working toward. What do you think?
