How To Leave Your Badly Paid Job And Start Earning Decent Money As A Window Cleaner

Finding work can be very tricky right now given the state of the economic climate in which we all operate. Many people are finding that their hours are being cut down, their wages are being slashed, or their jobs are being lost. Others are simply looking for other ways of making better money doing something they may enjoy slightly more than the work they carry do. One such option would be to set up your own window cleaning business. As such, here are some tips on how to ditch your low paid job and start earning good money as a window cleaner.

To do this there are several steps that you need to take. The first step to take is to do your market research as this will be very important in working out what sort of income you can make and whether or not it is viable to quit your job.

Consider whether you actually can and want to perform the role of a window cleaner as well. It is an arduous job and should only be done by someone who is not afraid to get up a ladder. As such, if you are afraid of heights it will certainly not be for you. Furthermore, unless you are fully mobile you should consider it either.

If you realise that plenty of opportunities are available then you need to get together the tools that you will need for the job. It is quite important few to try to find these at a reasonable price, particularly when you are starting up, as you won't have a large budget for them. However, always make sure that you have quality tools as well as these will be important in doing a quality job.

You need to be able to promote yourself and your new business properly if you are to build decent income streams through it. As a start-up business it can be difficult to set yourself up against some of the larger competition and therefore it is important that you look into offering something unique. Often this may include such things as discounts, special offers, and lower prices, especially when you want to establish a foothold.

It is extremely important that you get some practice before you start working for real so that you are able to offer quality services. Your income is going to be completely dependent upon the quality of your work and if you do not provide excellent service you are not going to get repeat custom. Furthermore, people will not offer referrals to people they know who need window cleaning services as well unless you provide them with an excellent job.

It is certainly a good idea to start part-time as well. You are likely to still be financially dependent upon your current salary or wage and therefore you should try to establish yourself part-time at first.
