Understanding The Tradition Of Exchanging Rings At A Wedding

There are countless reasons that people choose to exchange rings at weddings. The tradition started a long time ago. This happened because people wanted a way to signify that both members of the marriage were no longer single. The ring is supposed to signify an unending bond between both people.

Many individuals choose to exchange a ring with their partner because it is tradition. This does not mean that they fully understand the spiritual symbolic nature of the process. Giving a ring during the wedding ceremony is a public declaration of love and devotion between partners.

The exchange of a ring is also an opportunity for people that are at the wedding to witness the joining of two parts together. When two people become married, a new creation is intended to begin between them. Both people are now responsible to the other party when making decisions.

The jewelry is to signify the commitment that was made on the wedding day. It can be a never-ending reminder of promises that both people made the day they got married. Sometimes, people can draw strength from looking at the ring when things are not going well in the marriage.

The exchange of jewelry is something that everyone at the wedding is supposed to see. It is a symbolic joining of the souls of both individuals that are entering the marriage. It is very common to have identical pieces selected so that both parties are wearing half of the whole pair of rings.

It is easy to see that there are spiritual reasons for the exchange of rings as part of a wedding ceremony. Unfortunately many people do not completely grasp of the serious nature of exchanging them in this generation. That is not to say the tradition is lost, just that sometimes people are not taking the process as seriously as they could be. The trading of jewelry should have special meaning for both people that are involved.
