Your marketing articles have to appeal to a certain group or focus on a particular product. Don't forget about your niche or product. Many article marketers write articles that are too broad in scope and they don't appeal to any particular group. You should aim to write articles that are interesting. A great way to accomplish this would be to talk about a problem and then suggest your product as an example that can solve the problem. For example, if you're selling an eBook about weight loss techniques, you can list out the problems that are caused by weight gain and then give them other solutions for the problem. These solutions should be obvious but the technique here is to show the reader that what you're giving away in your eBook is much better than the traditional method. So, your goal is to write about a specific problem, describe the issues and let them know how your product can help. This particular plan works very well if it is done correctly. In addition, if you can convince the reader via your articles that you can solve their problem, you will receive higher conversions. Bum Marketing doesn't require that you use an extensive vocabulary for your marketing articles. Instead, you should try to write them in simple English that people can understand. You will only frustrate and confuse your prospective customers with a lot of difficult words.
