This is the most often used form of web hosting commonly available. A business will establish a set of servers which are dedicated to hosting web pages. Subsequently, each of their customers will pay a fee to use a small section of one of these servers, while other customers rent out other sections. So a server may be responsible for several hundred web sites at a time.

There are many advantages to choosing a shared hosting account. The high cost of buying and maintaining a server can be balanced against the income from multiple clients paying to use it, making it the least expensive form of commercial hosting. This is ideal for anyone with no high-level technical skills but who has a web site in need of hosting since your sole responsibility is monitoring your own account. Since this is a paid service, you will of course have access to customer support and contracts as well as official guarantees of space and uptime performance.

Perhaps the biggest drawback to using shared hosting is that because you share your space with other customers, you also share the resources of that server with other customers. The server, just like a home PC, has only so much memory, CPU and disk space available, and if other customers are using it heavily - or if the Web Host has put too many people on the server - or even if the server isn't particularly fast in the first place! - your website might ultimately suffer and more more slowly.

Using shared hosting options may also prevent you from using some of the more high-tech, advanced features which a dedicated server can offer you. Security can be an issue, depending upon your host - and the security of your neighbors - however, most servers are very secure just in the way that they are configured and set up, so chances are this really should not be a concern for most customers.

For the majority of users and websites, Shared Hosting is the perfect answer to the needs. There are a minuscule number of people who want or need more control over server contents and the vast majority will never need anything more.
