One of the most popular trends of education at the collegiate level over the past decade has been the accelerated degree program. It seems like everyone knows at least a few people doing this, and it certainly offers many unique benefits and advantages. But nothing is perfect for every single one of us, so is an accelerated schedule right for you, and are there any downsides to pursuing this form of education?

One of the main disadvantages that some people run into is that accelerated programs simply mean you are doing more in less time. That means you are going to have a busy, crowded schedule, and there's always going to be a lot on your plate.

After all, most people going back to school and looking for an accelerated degree to begin with have much more to deal with besides just school. These individuals are working 40 hours per week at a job to pay the bills, they are trying to juggle the responsibilities and demands of family and home life, and more.

Another thing to consider with accelerated bachelors degree programs is that by and large they are offered online. Today's online bachelor degree programs are actually pretty amazing, and they offer an extremely helpful and engaging learning environment. With that said though, it's still online and not in a classroom, and that's something that can't be completely replicated.

When you study online, you have to be able to motivate yourself at all times. There is no set schedule and class time you have to attend, and there are no classmates and teachers looking over your shoulder. It's really all up to you, and if you're not a self-motivated person, you could potentially struggle.

Studying online for an accelerated program also means you need to supply your own equipment. You need an up to date computer with the right software, and that can be expensive, and you also need a really good Internet connection, not to mention a good place to quietly study and learn.

One last thing to consider as a downside to an accelerated program offered online is that simply put, not all types of programs translate perfectly to the world of online learning. It would be hard to learn how to repair a car without actually getting under the hood and doing it yourself, and no amount of book or video learning can replace that completely.

So there are certainly a few potential downsides to taking an accelerated program, and taking it online. Nothing is ever going to be perfect though, so you have to weigh the upsides against the drawbacks to see what's really worth it for you. Millions of students are finding that the positives are far greater than the negatives in this case.
