Send your completed draft out to a couple of people to get different opinions and perspectives. That kind of feedback can help you improve the final draft of your eBook, as the opinions you receive will somewhat reflect how future readers will view it too.

Lastly, once you complete your draft of the eBook, make sure you get it proof-read so that there are absolutely no grammatical errors or spelling mistakes. Even though you may have checked over your work on your own, there will always be some errors that creep into your writing. Ask a friend to proof your work for you to see if they find anything. But if your budget stretches far enough, pay for a good proof reader to do it properly. Most of the time you'll find that the final version of the eBook makes more sense and is a lot more balanced.
