Many people enjoy working outdoors rather than being cooped up in an office. A construction worker often has the opportunity to work outside under the sun, breathing fresh air, while experiencing an ever changing variety of weather conditions. Hearty people enjoy the exercise they get during the workday. Work site locations are always changing, as are the people that are contacted.

In addition, there is that meditative, zen like experience of doing solitary work with your hands, and getting into that contentedness zone. When the project is completed, there is that deep satisfaction that comes with looking over and admiring your work. Having created such an artistic, well constructed, and useful thing by your own work is its own reward.

Roughly 32 percent of workers in this field are self employed. These independent individuals make their own work schedule, choose projects they like, work at a comfortable pace, and are their own boss. When there is a problem they are the responsible party. If they can be self motivated, work hard, and produce a good product for their customers, they alone get all the rewards.

Others work for other individuals or companies and are respected, valued employees who are well compensated. With specialized knowledge or skills they may be among the best paid. If possessing a good all around background they have the best chance of getting promoted and receiving raises.

To be successful in either of these scenarios requires that the worker become a knowledgeable authority in his industry. He must make himself useful in order to receive the rewards. Lacking competence and constantly trying to cover up deficiencies like not really knowing how to do a project, or being unable to complete it in a timely, accurate, and workman like way will make this work distinctively unpleasant.

Training courses available for young carpenters in the USA can make obtaining information needed for entry level positions enjoyable and quick. This knowledge can give the young worker the tools he needs, get him on track and jump start his career.
