

Published based on Career Choices For Business Majors Are Plentiful

Career Choices For Business Majors Are Plentiful

Don't know what major to declare? Ask an instructor how what you learning in class that can be used in the working world. If you have no idea what you want to do, think about getting a business degree. A business degree seems to be replacing liberal arts as the practical major for college students. Business majors are trained to manage accounts and organize and plan projects, skills that transfer to almost any job. Getting that degree from an online education may just be the right fit in your busy life. Find out if a business major might work for you by getting online to look it up along with degree in business for the latest data available.

According to the Department of Education, business is the most popular field of study for undergraduate students. In 2006, of the more than 1.5 million college graduates, more than 320,000 were in the field of business. In fact since 1996, the number of business graduates has almost doubled the number of students graduating in other areas of study. Why is business such a popular degree? Students recognize the skills learned in business are transferable to almost every job.

It's easy to add a few business classes to your resume by taking courses online. If this interests you, check out the many career options you may have once you obtain your degree, and then research accredited online schools to learn more about your education options. A class in business management or financial planning may be the ticket to getting a promotion at work. Whether you are just out of high school or already working, you can earn your college degree online. Everything is available on the Internet. The lectures, the tests and labs can all be completed when you are ready. The web replaces the need for college students to live on campus or put everything on holding for the sake of their education.

Online colleges often have the same courses as traditional brick and mortar institutions. Students start off taking basic courses like algebra, philosophy and writing. As the student advances and declares a major, more specific courses will be assigned. For a business major this will include economics, accounting and finance.

A bachelor's degree is your basic four year college degree. Associates degree programs, which traditionally take two years, are also available. All rankings of business degrees from associates to a Master's of Business Administration and a doctorate degree are available online. Many online programs also offer certification courses for those looking to work in a specific field.

A business degree is usable in several fields, but it does not have to be generic. There are several ways to specialize. Business majors can choose to specialize in accounting, finance or marketing and even human resources. If you know what career you want to pursue after graduating, a specialization may help you get there.

Business majors can expect to do well once they start working. The Pay Scale Report lists the ten most popular jobs for business majors including human resources manager, retail store manager and construction project manager. On average, these jobs paid $34,000 a year to workers with an undergraduate degree and some work experience.

Majoring in business seems to be one way to guarantee you will land a job after college. Thanks to the Internet, you don't have to re-arrange your life to attend online graduate schools. What you just might need to change your employment outlook is an online degree in business.

You can also find this article published on Career Choices For Business Majors Are Plentiful, and on the tag pages accredited online schools, accredited online universities, college courses online, colleges online, E-Learning, online college, online college classes, online education, online graduate programs, online programs, online school, online universities, schools online.